

Research Artifact 1

For this first Artifact of mine I looked into a video by CNA Insider on what happens when you give up your pet. This was set in Singapore with the interviewer asking shelters what they go through and how much space do they have for pets and looking at how much the abandonment of pets has increased very quickly since COVID. In Singapore shelters are struggling running at almost full capacity that they can hold of abandoned pets some keeping 10-5% of capacity open only to emergencies. A lot spoke that they struggle with their capacity and they are doing as much as they can and they stated that they went from receiving 1 phone call to 2-4 phone calls a week. They also stressed that they would have to reject the people that call or come to the shelter to give their pet away when they are full capacity. Some just dump their pets in the street if the shelters don't answer or take their pets in.

A lot of these pets feel like they live in a jail with some animals being at shelters for more than 5 years with a slim chance of getting adopted and all because they are not big and fluffy or cute. Most of these animals get walked by volunteers only and if there aren't any volunteers they will never be walked and live in their little cell for as long as they will. Another thing I learned is that since these pets that are being released in the streets most are not neutered and go on to give offspring and cause even more pets to be living in the streets and need rescuing. Another issue that I learned throughout this interview was that a lot of owners do backyard breeding with their pets to earn money and most of the time it's not safe and not humane what they do.

A main reason on why pets are being abandoned is due to the rise in costs since COVID and when a pet becomes old or is sick pet bills may become too much for the owners that they will not be able to pay the bills and will end up giving them away or leaving them alone in the streets. Overall through watching this interview it really gave me more insight on what goes on with the shelters and how they struggle and show their dedication and they also show how they would love to help all of the pets that come through their doors but the lack of funding and shelter is not enough for every pet and they can only do so much. I got to also understand why some owners give up their pets for example the rise in costs of vet bills and the rise of food and other costs that have gone up since COVID has happened. I hope I can continue to learn and see what other things go into when it comes to pet abandonment and other reasons to why it happens.
