

Abandoned Pets

Pets are always being abandoned left and right and for many different reasons. Some can't take care of them anymore and some get tired of the responsibility and some are just evil. Animals getting dumped in streets left and right is a big issue. They are always being mistreated especially when people decide to get a pet that they know they cannot take care of. A lot of records from Dosomething.org states that at least 7.6 million companions get thrown out and are impacted by homelessness each year. From personal experience when walking around my neighborhood I started to see birds that are definitely not from here. These types of birds are birds you would find in hotter climates and it was all leading to the point that they were abandoned and let go.

There are always better ways on how to go about it for example giving them to someone who is willing to take them in or giving them to a pet store or shelter that can take them in and give them to a better suited home for them. When seeing videos on the internet of these animals getting dumped on the street most of them look very well mistreated and neglected such as some where you could literally see their bone structure from how poorly fed they were. I think when it comes to thinking about what I hope to learn throughout this topic during the semester is more so to learning on how it starts why does the person adopt them at first and why does it give them that the best idea is to just dump them on the side of the street or an alley and let them live in homelessness for the rest of their lives if they are not caught.

Most of these pets are mistreated and can carry diseases if they encounter themselves in those certain situations that are not good for their health. Most of these animals encounter struggle and stress when trying to reopen to humans when they have lost all of their trust and faith in them because of the way that they were treated before. It also causes overpopulation if the animals are not neutered and released into the wild. It causes them to keep living on the streets and makes it harder for shelters and others to have space to take care of them and also to prevent it from happening.

I want to also touch on that I think the reasons why the number of animals getting throw out onto the streets is increasing could also be because of how much time and money you would have to put into one and with the lack of not neutering and being able to spay them incase of anything and due to homes or apartments not accepting pets and those people lacking in sense of the responsibility that they have when it comes to owning a pet. Moral of the story is do not adopt if you cannot take good care of it and give it the life it deserves and it goes for every pet. There are some pets that are in homes but are given a place too small to live in for example a hamster needs a LOT of space when it comes to adopting one but everyone has been influenced and put the idea that they just need a small cage to live in which is not correct at all. Which also shows how lack of knowledge about how to take care of your pet right can affect them. Not providing the pet the right space or habitat can stress them out and have them showing signs of stress and will cause your pet to not live a very happy life.

Another example is a turtle. We all know that turtles need a lot of space with a basking light and so on. I have seen owners of turtles who have kept the turtle their whole life in a 10 gallon tank and that is not providing the turtle with the right space and habitat that it needs. These are just some of the things that come to mind when adopting a pet. If you would like to adopt a pet you should always always do your research first and make sure that you have the space and time and money for it. I think that's one of the main reasons pets are always being abandoned and another thing is that they get abandoned when some are not fit at all to survive on their own because they are meant to be pets and not on the streets where they could easily get harmed.
